SALT negotiations, but was prepared to discuss the status of the Soviet weapons systems involved in the negotiations, and to bring the group up-to-date on developments since the Director's earlier briefing of 3 February 1972. Mr. Sikes inquired about the chart comparing Soviet and American weapons systems in today's Washington Post and Mr. Duckett explained that it was generally accurate so far as round numbers were concerned but was erroneous in certain details.

25X1C 6. Mr. Sikes spoke of the concern that Senator Jackson had voiced regarding some of the implications of a SALT agreement as described in recent press stories. The Director said he hoped his prepared statement would deal with some of the points raised by Senator Jackson. He then proceeded to deliver his prepared statement (a copy of which is on file in the Office of Legislative Counsel) in the course of which he offered some extemporaneous comments regarding [REDACTED]

8. In the ensuing discussion Mr. Sikes asked a number of questions about the effect of the SALT agreement as reported in the press on respective U.S. and Soviet weapons systems. He was told that the agreement did not apply to manned bombers. In response to one of his questions about the value of a space docking agreement with the Soviets, Mr. Duckett suggested that one consideration was rescue missions in the event of emergency.

9. Mr. Sikes was interested in why the Soviets were so concerned with the ABM protection for the NCA and not missile sites. He was told that the Russians had always considered Moscow important not only as the seat of government but also for symbolic and historic reasons. It was noted that the Soviets showed very little interest in ABM protection for their ICBM sites. Sikes expressed interest in the Soviet presence in the Indian Ocean and Africa and was told that the only recent development of significance was the Soviet-Iraqi agreement giving Soviet vessels access to Iraqi ports. In conclusion, Mr. Sikes (Acting Chairman in the absence of Mr. Mahon who had left earlier) thanked the Director for his very helpful presentation, commenting that the Director's briefings represented the "most dependable source of information that the Committee had."
